

SUMMARY STATEMENT AGAINST NATURAL DEPRAVITY

Virgil Warren, PhD

The proposition counter to natural depravity is as follows:

there is no (1) clear (2) biblical basis for saying that Adam's ability in (3) spiritual matters after the Fall was different from what it was (4) before the Fall in a (5) biologically inheritable sense.

By “clear” biblical base we mean that certain passages might be understood in the way natural depravity assumes, but no passage requires such a reconstruction; many texts proposed in support of that concept cannot have that meaning.

By “biblical” base we mean that some experiential observations on human nature might fit with a natural depravity. Skinnerian psychology proposes something similar even though the experimental evidence for it is no closer to proof than the biblical evidence for it. But Christian theologians are concerned with biblical more than scientific evidence. “Biblical” evidence contrasts with “philosophical” thought. Natural depravity is understandable with relatively strong explanatory power and can be put in self-consistent terms (minus the strictures noted above in John Calvin's formulation of it). But the theological task is not a creative one so much as it is an interpretative one. Christian teaching needs to arise from scripture, not from imagination.

Ability in “spiritual” matters distinguishes this issue from losses that scripture indicates our first parents did incur when they disobeyed. Genesis or elsewhere says nothing about any loss of ability to operate interpersonally with God or other people after the Fall.

The phrase “before the fall” compares the way mankind was after sinning from before. We can imagine having more power to resist temptation and obey God, but the proper comparison is not between the way we are and some imaginable possibility, but between the way Adam was before and after the Fall. When Adam first sinned, he did not have a “fallen” nature, so having a fallen nature is not necessary for explaining why we all sin.

“Biologically” inheritable specifies that the defect must be genetically transmitted if it requires supernatural remedy. Behavioral depravity can be socially transmitted—as well as originated again and again in each of us because of ignorance in combination with our viewpoint of consciousness, the pull of neutral bodily drives that we can fulfill in negative ways, and negative social influence. The failure to live above our viewpoint of consciousness, to override bodily drives by rational values, and to resist social temptation stems from the fact that it is easier not to live transcendentally. It is easier to act by our own present material interests than to curb self-gratification by taking into consideration the welfare of others, future consequences, and transcendent principles. After sin has originated in each of us, the neutral ability of habit formation explains how it is perpetuated in us. Psychological depravity—the power of sin to hold us down, the bondage of the will—can result from our own previous sin. It can be understood as the pull of past sin on present resolve, that is, ingrained habit rather than inborn defect. Psychological depravity is “self-depravitization” rather than hereditary depravity. In other words, the natural-depravity proposal represents overkill as an explanation for universal and all-pervasive sin in humankind.
